AroundMe is a smart tool that helps you find nearby photos and interesting places in the real world. It can be used in addition to your existing maps or can be used as a standalone app. With this tool you can search nearby images on a map. These images will be displayed on your screen. You can also see the location the photo was taken by entering a location name in the search bar. A live tile will also update the location. Author: tusole Tusole is a software engineer who loves exploring the realm of personal computing and photography. His hobbies also include playing around with LEGO, hiking and watching Brazilian football(soccer). He has a passion for travel and would love to visit somewhere new and exotic. Started as a hobby while I was still in highschool. Was hardly ever used outside of my own desktop, but nowadays I use it constantly. I started using this app almost five months ago now and it helped me get interested in photography, most specifically street photography. The app has a huge database of photos, and also gives the option to add your own. The interface is friendly, and it also offers good search options. The only thing I didn't really like were the settings menus - it was too crowded to navigate easily, and the settings were harder to access than it needed to be. When I had to add my own photos the selection process was clumsy and time-consuming. When it comes to usability it seems a lot better than say Lookout or Fused. It has some faults but overall it's not a bad app. This is another of those apps that is clearly aimed at the mainstream market, as it requires almost no technical knowledge at all. It's just a simple slider for zooming the map, which might be ok on a smart phone but it's not the best thing in the world on a high-resolution screen. The free version also only includes a limited number of images, and even the paid version only has 40,000 images, which is quite small compared to the free version. That's a bit of a problem, as the average user won't want to pay $1.99 for images, but this is what you're stuck with. As others have said, it's a bit like the previous camera lens apps - but this isn't really much of an issue, since the user doesn't need to capture and upload their own photos, as the photos are provided by the service provider.
