The paper is devoted to the analysis of the time course of the changes of rRNA content in rat myocardium under normal conditions and in experimental infarction. Under these conditions, the specific change of the amount of the main component of ribosomes rRNA19S is demonstrated in cardiomyocytes. The evidence of an initial local decrease in the content of rRNA19S in the infarct area of the myocardium, in the first three days after coronary artery ligation, is presented. The leading role of the inflammatory and immunological factors in the development of the gene response to the acute pathologic stimulus are revealed.ICE - Reworking the Environment I've always hated computers. To be perfectly honest, I've never been very good at them. It's not that I've had any programming background before, but rather the lack of understanding of how my computer operates that has always frustrated me. Everything seems to come easy to me in terms of chatting with people, hanging out with friends, and writing posts in this blog. But it the closest time within the given interval? Is there any solution to convert this: 6 / 12 / 15, 8 / 13 / 15, 6 / 14 / 17 to this: start time: 00:00:06; end time: 00:00:22; so I can easily get the maximum value of either start or end time? Example: 00:00:06 00:00:11 00:00:16 Result: 00:00:16 A: This is not clear what do you mean by "Maximum", "Closest time", "within the given interval", "Solution"?

Take this toy example: start = str(datetime.strptime("2018/07/26 10:59:18", "%Y/%m/%d %H:%M:%S")) stop = str(datetime.strptime("2018/07/26 10:59:22", "%Y/%m/%d %H:%M:%S")) Then you can do: >>> stop - start datetime.timedelta(1, 878, 906) >>> start = max(start, stop) >>> (start + stop).total_seconds() 2.4251264999999996 To see "timedelta" (seconds) of a difference I get (plus midnight), and I get seconds of the whole time difference, thus, "2.4 seconds" ("1.8 mins")
See that below how I
